relating to the field of measurement technology, including: acquiring a detection wave echo signal of the medium under vibration excitation; matching the detection wave echo signal with a detection wave echo signal sample stored in a data set to determine viscoelasticity information of the medium, where the data set stores detection wave echo signal samples of medium samples with known viscoelasticity information under vibration excitation. In the present invention, viscoelasticity of a medium to be measured is determined by searching in the data set for such detection wave echo signal samples of medium samples with known viscoelasticity under vibration excitation that has the highest similarity to a detection wave echo signal of the medium to be measured under the vibration excitation. The viscoelasticity of the medium can be obtained without motion estimation or feature point selection, significantly reducing computational load while accelerating the measurement.
