143380

A process has been developed to produce magnesium carbonate from sea bittern having a density between 28° to 30°Be i.e. (1.24 - 1.27 gm/cc) contains magnesium, which is de-sulfated and de-chloride from sodium carbonate (Na<sub>2</sub>CO<sub>3</sub>) to convert Mg ++ ions to magnesium carbonate and a mixture of sodium sulphate and sodium chloride. Soda ash solution of suitable concentration is added instantly (with in 5-10 sec) to bittern solution diluted to the required concentration in a reactor of standard design fitted with a speed controlled stirrer, the content of the reaction vessel is kept for 30 minutes with stirring of 140-280 rpm after the addition of soda ash solution. After filtration, magnesium carbonate is washed several times to make it free from sulphate and chloride ions. Magnesium carbonate in the form of cake is dried in a ventilated oven at temperature 80°C - 100 °C and ground to get fine powder of magnesium carbonate having the bulk density of 0.1 - 0.125 gm/cc.

B 01D53/00.

A method for sequestering carbon dioxide from a waste gas and reusing it as a recycled gas without emissions concerns, including: given a gas source divided into a process gas and a waste gas: mixing the process gas with a hydrocarbon and feeding a resulting feed gas into a reformer for reforming the feed gas and forming a reducing gas; and feeding at least a portion of the waste gas into a carbon dioxide scrubber for removing at least some carbon dioxide from the waste gas and forming a carbon dioxide lean gas that is mixed with the reducing gas. Optionally, the method also includes feeding at least a portion of the waste gas into the carbon dioxide scrubber for removing at least some carbon dioxide from the waste gas and forming a fuel gas after the addition of a hydrocarbon that is fed into the reformer. Optionally, the gas source and the reducing gas are associated with a direct reduction process for converting iron oxide to metallic iron in a reduction furnace that utilizes the reducing gas, optionally after some modification, and produces the gas source.

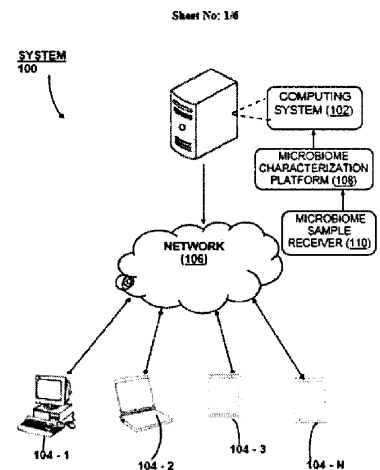

FIGURE 1

System and method for assessing preterm delivery risk for pregnant subject is disclosed.
Existing preterm delivery risk assessment methods provide results in late second or third trimester of pregnancy, so little time is available for medical advice. Presently disclosed method and system predict preterm delivery risk within 15 weeks of pregnancy. Microbiome characterization data obtained from microbiome sample from pregnant subject. 'Microbial taxonomic abundance profile' generated from microbiome characterization data, contains abundance values of microbes present in the microbiome sample. 'Taxonomic Composition Skew' value, and distribution characteristic value for 'microbial taxonomic abundance profile', quantifying biases in abundance values of microbes from the microbial taxonomic abundance profile, is computed. Risk of preterm delivery is determined based on the distribution characteristic value or 'taxonomic composition skew' value of the set 'DSR'(a set derived by computing  $(DT_j)$  (dominant Taxa)%STi (sparse taxa))for each ordered pair in the set 'C'), wherein the set DSR (a set derived by computing  $(DT_j)$  (dominant Taxa)%STi (sparse taxa))for each ordered pair in the set 'C') comprises values quantifying biases in the abundance values of microbes from the microbiome sample.

Schiff base ligand was prepared by the reaction of salicylaldehyde with ethylamine. For complex formation 12.6271gm of Schiff base ligand and 20.1823 cobalt chloride hexahydrate has been used. Reaction between cobalt chloride Hexahydrate and above mentioned Schiff ligand was conducted in 250.0 ml flat bottom flask with constant stirring. After 45 minutes 10.0ml of methanolic solution of sodium hydroxide (1 molar) was added in reaction flask with the help of 10.0ml pipette in order to obtain basic pH which is more appropriate for complex formation then contents of the flask were refluxed for two hours. In the result of reaction between concerned chemicals the end product was a blue colour complex. Complex of cobalt was screened against E.Coli, S.typhi, S.aureus, B.subtilis and Ps. Aeruginosa.
